"Our Duchess," Back In America, Pretty as Ever and Wants Vote

Photos copyright, 1914, by American Press Association.

NEWPORT has long been the Mecca of the high society of our land—and sometimes of the male portion of foreign lands. But never until this season has it been the Mecca of the suffragists. The lodestone that is attracting the votes for women workers is the Duchess of Marlborough, who is visiting her mother, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, at Marble House, Mrs. Belmont's paternal estate there. The duchess, who, as every one knows, was Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt, is a suffragist, but not a militant. She has done a lot for the cause in England in a safe and sane way. Shortly after her arrival at Newport Mrs. Belmont, who is herself an ardent suffragist, gave a suffrage reception at which the duchess told of her work in England and at which these pictures of her were snapped.

JOHN E. REDMOND, the Irish leader in parliament, has hopes of a peaceful settlement of the home rule troubles in Ulster, although Sir Edward Carson claims to have an army of 100,000 men ready to oppose enforcement of home rule. Certainly it is that the north of Ireland people have large supplies of guns and ammunition. The illustration shows Redmond and a group of Carson's soldiers. It is reported that boatloads of guns and bullet-have been smuggled into the Orangemen's headquarters at Belfast.
